Eighth Graders Try Hand at Chicken Care

Members of Larry Miller's eighth grade class at Parkway Elementary School can't stand the thought of a chicken dinner any more.

The reasons for these feelings lie in a cage outside the classrooms. The class has three chickens, which they call "The Three Stooges." The birds were raised from eggs by the class.

As part of their science projects, the class got a dozen eggs and kept them warm in a home-made apparatus. During the incubation period of 18 to 21 days, the class periodically broke open an egg to see what chick embryos look like in various stages of development. The embryos were preserved in alcohol.

Finally, four eggs hatched, but one of the chicks did not survive. The other three, including a rooster and two hens, have thrived.

They grew so fast that the class soon had to build them an outside pen. The chickens now are favorites of the whole school.

As soon as the chickens' life cycle has completed itself — that is as soon as the lady chickens lay eggs — the class will give the birds to a chicken farm. They will be given only with the understanding that their pets will not become part of somebody's Sunday dinner.
